Two Stories about Flying Part 1: His First Flight Summary

This story is about a young seagull who is too scared to fly. Even though his siblings had smaller wings, they bravely took their first flights. But the young seagull didn't trust his wings and was afraid he would fall, so he stayed alone on the ledge. His parents scolded and warned him that he would go hungry if he didn't fly, but he still couldn't overcome his fear.

One day, his family flew to a nearby plateau, leaving him behind. As the sun rose and hunger grew, he pleaded with his mother for food. She came close with a piece of fish, and out of desperation, he jumped to get it. That's when he started falling—but suddenly, his wings opened, and he realized he could fly. His fear turned into joy, and he soared through the sky, joining his family in the air and over the sea.

Two Stories about Flying Part 2: Black Aeroplane Summary

"Black Aeroplane" by Frederick Forsyth is a mysterious story about a pilot's strange flying experience. The narrator, who is also the pilot, is flying from France to England to have breakfast with his family. After crossing Paris, he saw huge black storm clouds ahead. Even though they looked dangerous, he decided to fly through them. Once inside, everything turned pitch dark, and he couldn't see anything. His instruments stopped working, and he lost control of the plane.

Just then, he noticed another plane flying nearby. It had no lights, but its pilot waved at him to follow. With no radio signals and very little fuel left, he followed the strange plane. It guided him out of the storm, and he safely landed on a runway. When he asked the airport staff about the other plane, they said no other aircraft had been in the sky that night. The mystery of the unknown pilot remains unsolved.
