D. J. Enright's poem 'The Rebel' spans 30 lines and delves into the traits of a nonconformist in society. The rebel depicted in the poem deviates from the usual norms embraced by others in society. Enright portrays the rebel as someone who stands apart from the crowd, with no inclination towards any political activism. Instead, the rebel resembles a young person striving to distinguish themselves.

If the majority keeps their hair short, the rebel opts for long locks, and vice versa. While others engage in chatter, the rebel remains silent, but disrupts silence when others are quiet. Rebels set themselves apart by finding beauty in unconventional circumstances, appreciating the sun on rainy days and rain during sunny spells.
