Do Laws Apply to All?

Laws are designed to apply equally to everyone, without discrimination based on religion, caste, or gender. The principle of the rule of law ensures that no one is above the law, regardless of their status or position.

This means that whether a person is a government official, a wealthy individual, or even the President, they are all subject to the same legal standards. Any crime or legal infraction carries specific punishments and follows a formal process to determine guilt. This uniform application of laws upholds justice and fairness within society.

How Do New Laws Come About?

New laws are created through a structured legislative process primarily driven by Parliament. The process begins with the identification of societal needs or issues that may require legal intervention. Members of Parliament (MPs), along with input from experts and citizens, propose new laws or amendments to existing ones.

The proposed laws, known as bills, are then debated and examined in detail within parliamentary committees. Public input is crucial throughout this process; citizens can voice their opinions through media, public consultations, and petitions.

After thorough discussions and revisions, the bill is voted on by Parliament. If approved, it proceeds to the President for final assent before becoming law. This comprehensive process ensures that new laws reflect public concerns and are well-considered before implementation.

Unpopular and Controversial Laws

Unpopular and controversial laws can be legally valid but still face significant criticism from the public if they are perceived as unjust or harmful. When people feel that a law's intentions are unfair, they may respond by criticizing it, organizing public meetings, writing letters to newspapers, or reporting it to TV news channels.

Such widespread discontent can create substantial pressure on Parliament to review and potentially amend or repeal the law. It is the responsibility of citizens to remain vigilant and actively monitor their representatives to ensure that the laws enacted are in line with public interest and ethical standards.
