2. What is the problem with the periodisation of Indian history that James Mill offers?

Answer.

James Mill's periodisation of Indian history, dividing it into Hindu, Muslim, and British periods, presents certain problematic views, particularly highlighting the superiority of the British over Hindus and Muslims. His approach has several flaws:

a. Mill viewed all Asian societies as inferior to Europe in terms of civilisation, reflecting a Eurocentric bias that undermines the rich cultural and intellectual contributions of Indian civilization.

b. He depicted pre-British India as a period dominated by despotic Hindu and Muslim rulers, ignoring the diversity and complexity of governance systems and cultural achievements during those times.

c. Mill portrayed pre-colonial Indian society as characterized by religious intolerance, caste-based discrimination, and superstitions. This oversimplified and negative portrayal overlooks the rich tapestry of social, cultural, and religious practices that existed in India before British colonization.

3. Why did the British preserve official documents?

Answer.

The British preserved official documents as they believed that thorough documentation would facilitate study and debate in the future. By meticulously recording their decisions and actions, they aimed to create a comprehensive record of their governance. This practice served two main purposes:

1. Study and Analysis: Preserving official documents enabled the British administrators to study and analyze their decisions and policies over time. By documenting their actions, they could evaluate their effectiveness and make informed decisions for future governance.
2. Legal Proof and Accountability: The British considered official records as evidence of their decisions and actions. They believed that maintaining a detailed record would provide legal proof and accountability for their administrative decisions. In case of disputes or challenges, these records could be used to justify their actions and decisions.

4. How will the information historians get from old newspapers be different from that found in police reports?

Answer.

The information historians gather from old newspapers and police reports can vary significantly. Historians typically collect data from diverse sources, including both official and unofficial documents. Police reports offer an administrative perspective and often have limited details, focusing primarily on record-keeping rather than storytelling.

While police reports stick to procedural information, journalism and reporting take a different approach, providing richer context and detailed descriptions of events. However, newspapers may overlook or omit information that isn't directly related to law enforcement.

Newspapers, as a mass media, offer broader perspectives and elaborate on events. Yet, the accuracy and value of information from any source require thorough research and investigation. Historians aim to create a balanced and comprehensive understanding of historical periods by examining multiple sources, considering biases, and assessing underlying interests.
